Magic Farm charms and enchants especially thanks to Robin, the dragon help mate. Robin helps a young girl with no name find her missing beloved parents. To find her parents, she needs to work on a farm to raise money for trips and trades with the townspeople. Finding her parents only takes up half of the game. The other half sends the girl on quests where she completes a variety of tasks.

The town folk guide the girl on her journey, buy plants from her, and sell items to help her. Managing the farm requires staying on top of food and water supplies, beating off monsters and bugs with a stick or whatever tool at hand, feeding plants, and gathering bloomed flowers. A level lasts for one day, so a clock appears to show how much of the day is left. The timing of a day changes - it's not clear how this works.

Robin helps with all the tasks and, unlike other games involving a helper, does a great job of not crashing into the girl while working. He's a pleasure to have around as company and never annoys while the two work hard cultivating the variety of beautiful plants. The two travel from farm to farm and discover new plants and more aggressive bugs and monsters.

The plants range in price. The first farm has plants priced at $20 (chamomile), $40 (cash tree) and $80 (rose) while the cheapest plant on the second farm costs over $80. Plants also evolve into two other plants that a strawberry plant starts out as a basic red strawberry and eventually changes into silver and golden strawberries. Advanced plants such as the tigerbloom ($85), fern (212), and light ($425) command higher prices, but are harder to come by.

The flowers cost more when selling them as a bouquet instead of as singles. For instance, selling three single flowers is worth $6, but selling them together as a bouquet is worth $12. The Flower Shop has a nice set up showing the flowers in inventory and the available bouquets to make. After finding the parents, the Flower Shop turns into a chore. Since making bouquets pays better, it grows old to keep moving single flowers into the matching bouquet one-by-one. Sure, you can move faster and just sell them all as individuals, but then it takes longer to raise money for whatever you need.
